The use of cell phones is frequent in the urban landscape and with the new facebook and twitter applications, it's no longer about sharing information or communicating with a few friends, now its sharing this formerly private information about what you're doing or where you are with the world. The public and the private are being blurred through the introduction of new media, social networking and the information age. The public act of shopping is becoming private as internet purchasing increases, private thoughts and information is becoming public as social networks grow. Is this change in aptitude purely virtual or has it also changed the way we see and act in the real world? Are people prepared to place the same private information they announce in the virtual world out in the physical world?

UCA Canterbury School of Architecture student's facebook updates, December 2010.

THE CABINS
Each cabin is made for a particular use. They can be transported anywhere and used for living. Could this be an example of private actions in public space?

B3 DESIGN CARDBOARD CAFÉ
Building technique used was of bringing a lot of cardboard "bricks" together and mounting them together.

STEALTH.UNLIMITED CUT FOR PURPOSE
Built using strips of cardboard with a row of wood to keep it stable. It is lightweight because of spaces placed between every sheet. Those spaces could be used for the storing of information.

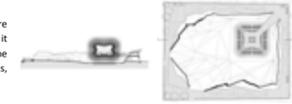

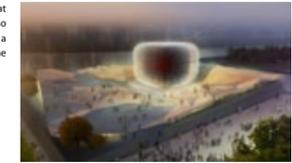

It starts out with a seed followed by many other seeds that gather to make the structure of the pavilion. Each seed is enclosed in the end of an optic fiber that pierces the main fabric of the building so allowing light to travel in. They map out a wave of information that emphasizes the massiveness of the UK's botanic knowledge.

This mapping of information is one we are trying to achieve with our device so that it becomes a public documentation of the written ideas, comments, wishes, emotions, ect. of Canterbury citizens.

HEATHERWICK STUDIO
UK PAVILION

The UK pavilion was built for the Shanghai Expo of 2010. It showcases seeds from the Royal Botanical Gardens at Kew, representing the UK's historical interest in greenery and the importance of seeds as the originators of most of the planet's resources. The building embodies the city and nature through making the building "grow" from these seeds.

TOM ENDERSON WRITING BOOTH

A personal space for writing in a public environment was Enderson's goal when creating the writing booth.

We found his project, though it takes a different turn, is very similar to ours in the way that it relates to the writing of data and its significance in space.

George Perec, Species of Spaces

"There are very few events which don't leave a written trace at least. At one time or another, almost everything passes through a sheet of paper (..) on which, at varying speeds and by a different technique depending on the place, time or mood, one or another of the miscellaneous elements that comprise the everydayness of life comes to be inscribed."

The techniques at which we record these events have changed and expanded, from notebooks to letters, e-mail, livejournal and facebook. From private controlled information, to the vast publicity of the internet.

James Joyce, Ulysses

"But mind you, don't post yourself into the box little man, he said. The boys six-eyed Father Conmee and laughed... Master Brunny Lynam ran across the road and put Father connee's letter to father provincial into the mouth of the bright red letterbox. Father Conmee smiled and nodded and smiled and walked along Mountjoy Square east."

Writing is not the only form of information sharing. Word of mouth and phones are a popular example. The design of the writing booth feels inspired by a phone booth. Although it is outdated, it is a perfect example of private and public furniture.

CASA DI GIULIETTA

Verona is the city of Romeo and Juliet and Juliet's house is one of the main tourist attractions of the city. It is visited daily by people who write their deepest, most private and emotional thoughts on paper and stick these up on the walls.

The wall, could be said, works as a medium of communication between the writer and Shakespeare's character, Juliette. Its success is propelled mainly by the fame of the play and the romantic atmosphere of the place.

EMA SHINTO

A tradition of the Shinto religion in Japan, people write their wishes, prayers and resolutions on wooden blocks (ema) which are hung in hopes the gods will read them.

The structures of the shrines are metal slabs with hooks onto which people can hang their blocks. An added roof provides shelter against rain. It is man-made and rigorous compared with the sleekness of the wishing trees.

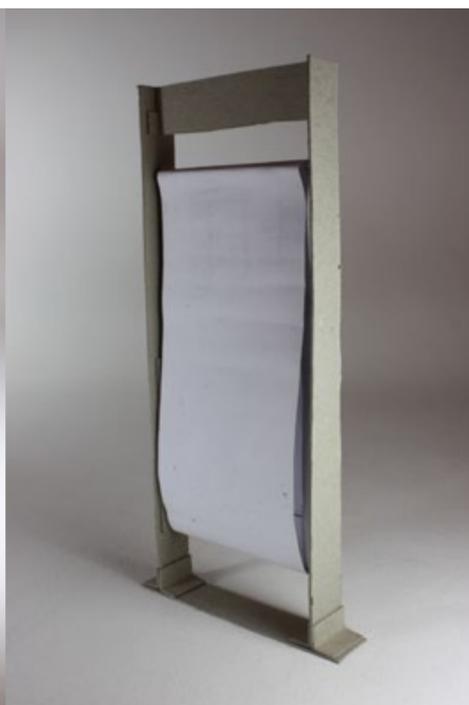

JAPANESE WISHING TREES

At around new-year's time, people write their wishes on strips of paper and hang them on trees in hopes that they will be heard by the spirits and fulfilled.

This tradition has spread well beyond Japan thanks to the increasing popularity of Japanese culture in the western world and figures such as Yoko Ono.

The style of the wishing trees connects with nature in a way that can be related to architecture. The wishes act like leaves which are hung on a stable structure. Our device could take this concept of creating a basic grid and having the information create the outer shape.

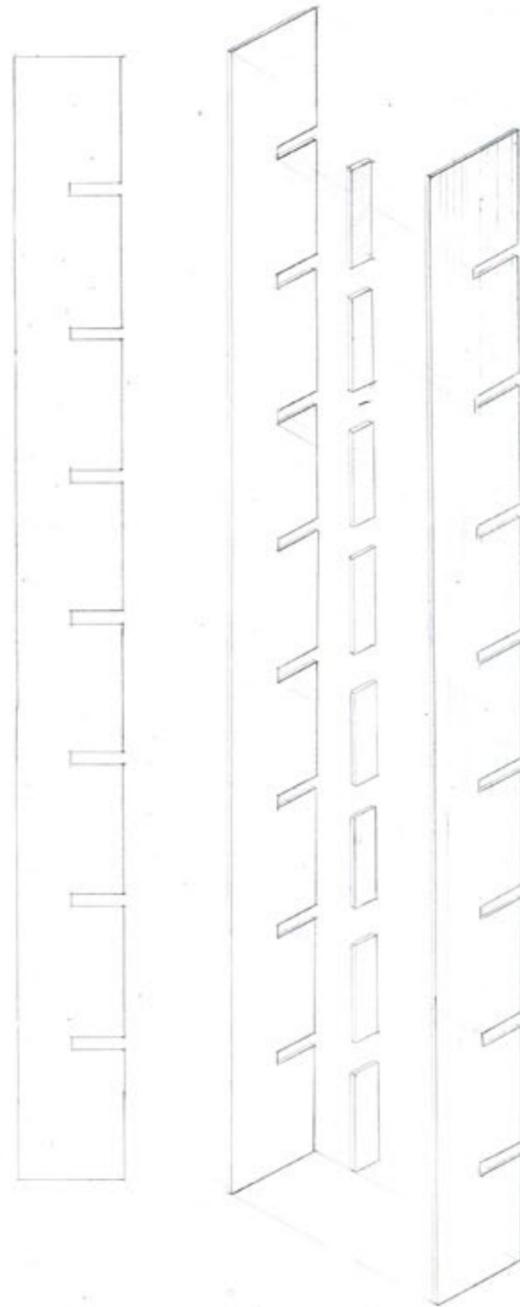

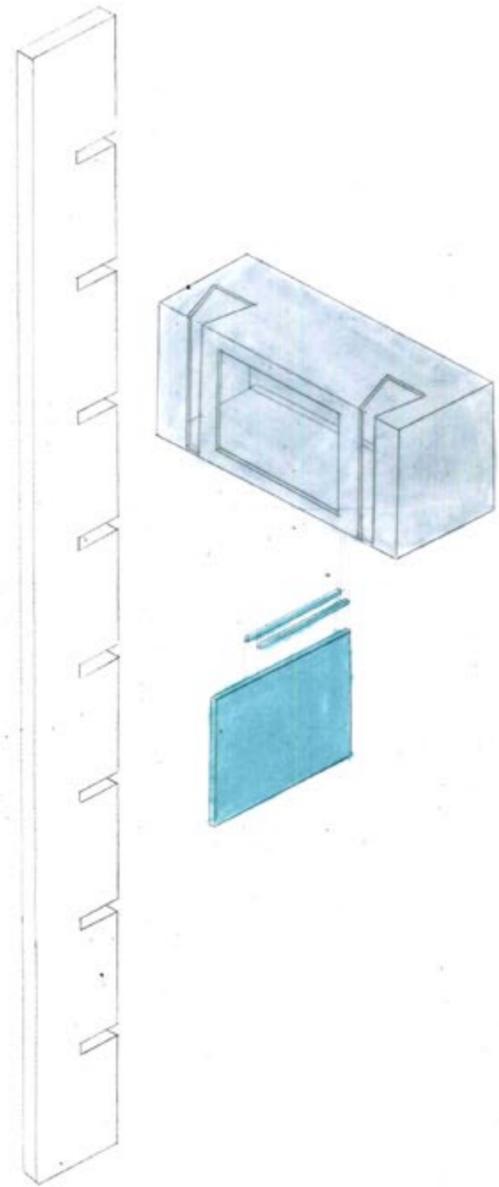

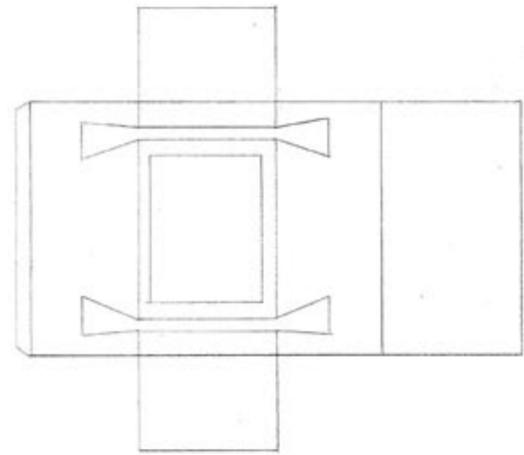

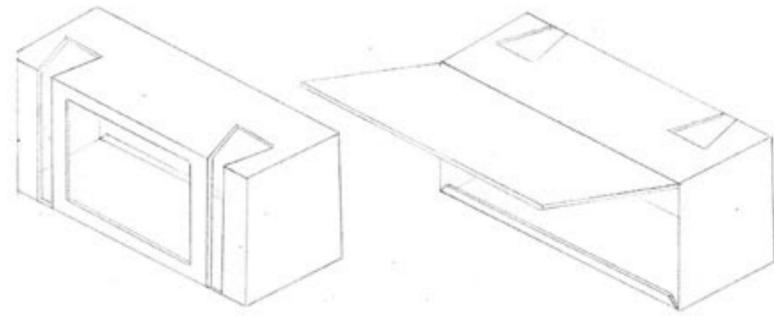

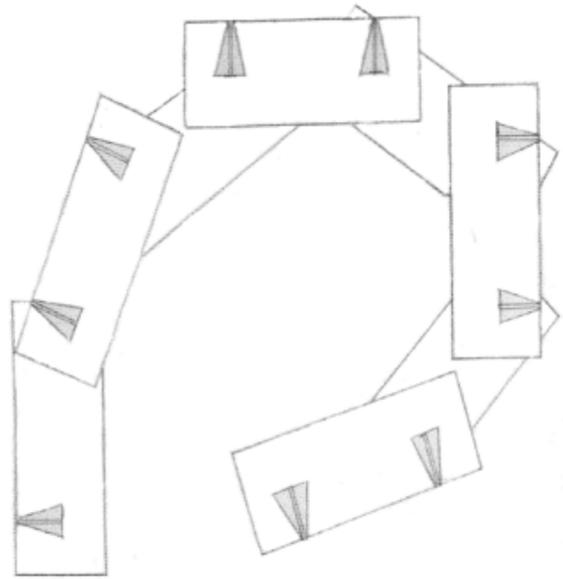

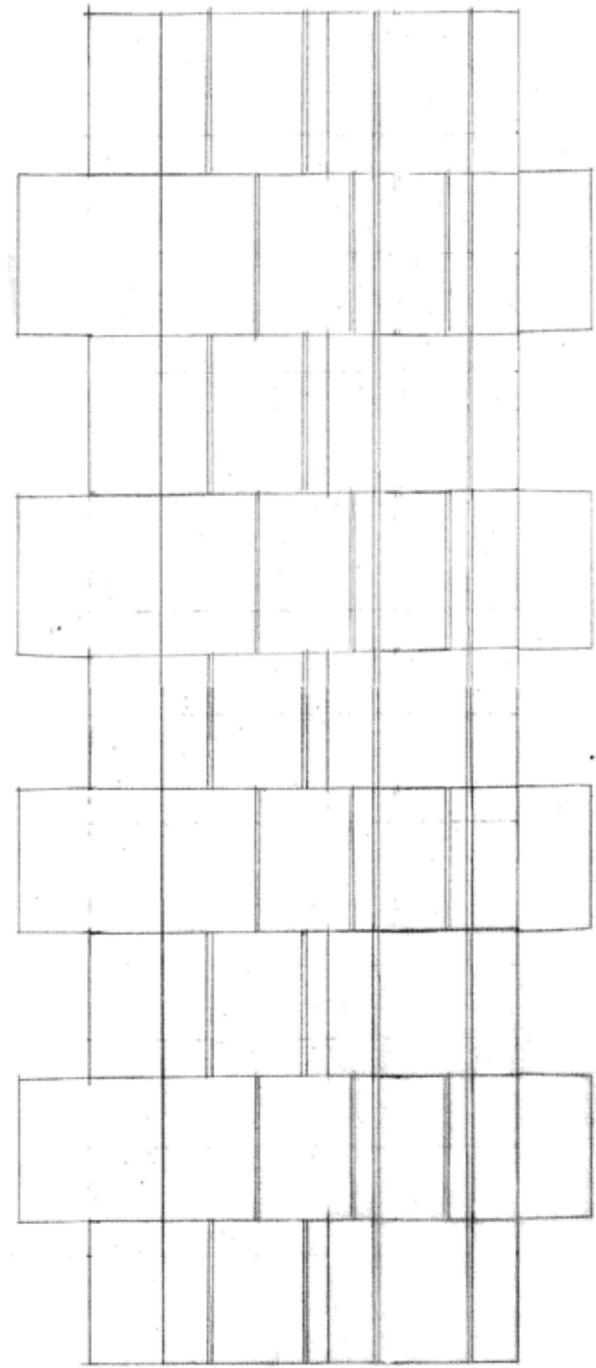

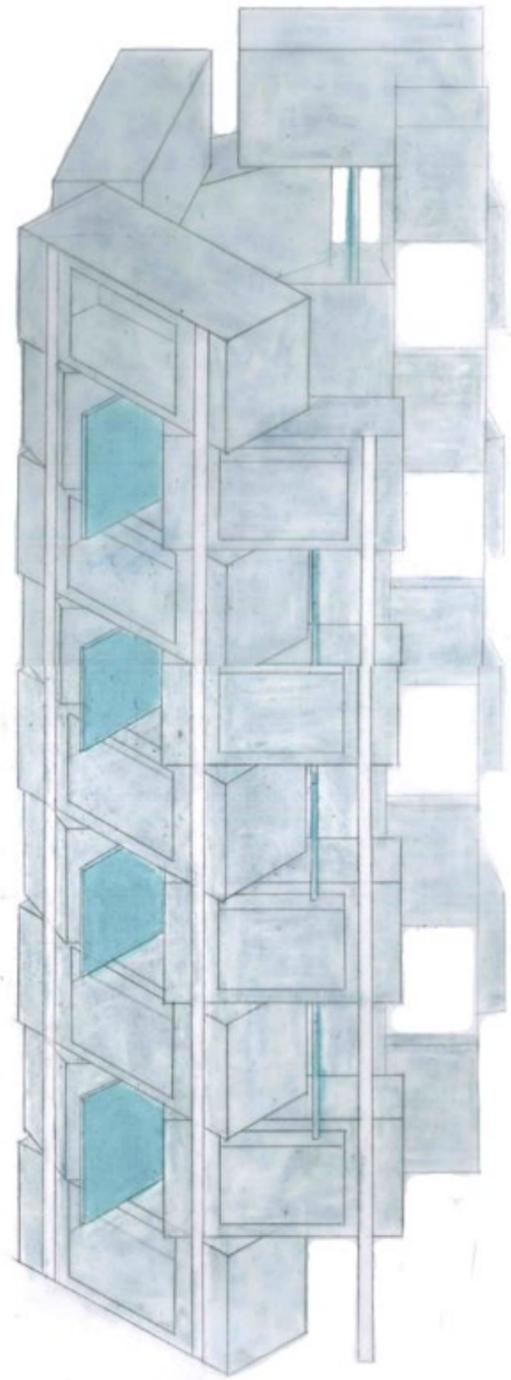

George Perec described space to begin with words. These words make a space of inventory and invention. The Page will attempt to create this space and invite people to write their thoughts in it. It will allow the citizens of Canterbury to post, to physically write out their daily on goings - private information - into a published format where anyone passing by can read. The inner thinking area of The Page, like their intellect, will be completely private. The outer area will be public and these thoughts will traverse from the private to the public.

The impact we are aiming for is one of awareness and enjoyment: the enjoyment of having the choice to publicize or privatize your information in any space and an awareness of what information we are sharing and why.
